

When someone dies

Information, guidance and support for family and friends

This guide is dedicated to those grieving the death of someone they love

Introduction

We would like to offer our sincere sympathy to you and those important to you following your sad loss.

Death can happen at any time of life. Sometimes it is expected, because of illness or ageing; sometimes it happens suddenly without warning. You may find it difficult to attend to the many practical things that need to be done when experiencing the emotions that come with grief.

Talking to someone and sharing your feelings can help. For some people, relying on family and friends is the best way to cope. For others, speaking to someone outside their family circle, such as a support organisation, can help.

We hope that you find the information in this booklet useful and that it will, in some small way, help with the anxiety and distress you may be feeling at this difficult time.

About this booklet

This booklet is designed to help you read the relevant sections as you need them. Don't feel that you need to read everything.

Some sections focus on how you may be feeling; others focus on the practical arrangements that you may have to organise. Details of organisations offering support are included towards the back of this guide along with space for your notes.

There are some quotes from people who have been bereaved and who have experienced something of what you may be going through.

Your family, friends or colleagues may also find it helpful to read this guide to help them understand how they can support you.

First Steps

First Steps

When someone dies

When someone dies a doctor, or in some cases a nurse, will confirm that the person has died. If the death has been sudden or not due to natural causes, the doctor will notify the coroner.

Medical Certificate of Cause of Death

The Medical Certificate of Cause of Death (MCCD) will be completed by a doctor when the deceased died of natural causes and the doctor can state the cause of death. The Independent Medical Examiner will then contact the doctor and, on occasion, the next of kin to discuss the cause of death recorded on the MCCD.

Burial

The deceased's next of kin will usually contact a funeral director for further assistance with regard to arrangements for burial.

Cremation

If cremation has been chosen the doctor should be informed as soon as possible as an additional form will be required. The funeral director will also offer further assistance with arrangements.

Release of body

If your loved one died in hospital, their body will be released once the Medical Certificate of Cause of Death has been completed. This may take some time, as legally it can only be completed by the appropriate doctor. You should only make provisional funeral arrangements until this becomes available.

Registering the death

The death should be registered at a General Registrar's office to allow arrangements to be made for the funeral except when the matter has been referred to the coroner.*

* For further information regarding what happens when the coroner is notified, see page 9

2

The Early Days

The Early Days

When someone dies, many decisions and arrangements need to be made. Dealing with the practicalities can feel overwhelming. It is important to take some time to gather your thoughts, to cry or to talk. You might find it helpful to seek support from another family member or someone outside the family whom you trust. Your funeral director or faith representative can help you plan the funeral.

If healthcare staff or your funeral director needs to be aware of any specific religious or cultural requirements in caring for your loved one after death, do let them know as soon as possible.

Burial Arrangements

If the death occurred at the weekend or over a bank holiday, or if the coroner is involved, this may delay the funeral. You can only make provisional funeral arrangements once the Medical Certificate of Cause of Death (MCCD) is issued or the coroner permits. A funeral director can provide further assistance with the arrangements.

Cremation

If you are planning to have your loved one cremated, you should inform the doctor or the nurse providing their care and inform your funeral director, so the relevant documentation can be prepared. A second doctor will need to confirm the cause of death and complete part of the cremation form. There is an additional cost for completing cremation forms. Your funeral director can deal with these arrangements for you. The only crematorium in Northern Ireland is Roselawn Crematorium in Belfast.

Organ and Tissue Donation

Your loved one may have expressed a wish to donate their organs. There can be reasons why this is not possible and why it hasn't been discussed with you, such as a medical condition, the cause of death or the place in which the death occurred. However, tissue donation may be suggested. It may be possible to donate tissue such as corneas (parts of the eye) and heart valves to help others with certain medical conditions. If you wish to speak to someone about tissue donation please tell a member of nursing staff before leaving the hospital.

The Coroner

Under certain circumstances a death is referred to the coroner.

We understand that this may add to your distress and can cause additional anxiety. It may also delay funeral arrangements. We hope that the information here will explain why this is necessary and some of the processes that are followed.

It is the coroner's role to establish the cause of death - the 'how, when and where' - of any sudden, unexpected or unnatural death.

If a doctor cannot certify the death then the coroner will either certify it or investigate to establish the cause of death. This may include ordering a post-mortem examination, obtaining witness statements and medical records or holding an inquest. The death cannot be registered until the coroner gives permission.

Coroner's Post-mortem Examination

If a coroner's post-mortem (PM) examination is required, the coroner will ask the police to assist with gathering information about the death. This will usually include speaking to you, as the family of the deceased, to anyone who was caring for the deceased and to anyone who was there when the death happened. A member of the family will be asked to formally identify the body. The police may ask you to do this at the place where the death happened or at the hospital mortuary; you will need to do this before the post-mortem examination is carried out. The coroner does not need permission from the next of kin for a coroner's post-mortem examination.

The coroner's liaison officers are people who work for the coroner to help bereaved families when a post-mortem examination has been ordered. They will contact you and explain the processes and stages in the Coroner's investigation. They will also provide a 'Certificate of Evidence of Death' to assist with financial matters.

Consented Hospital Post-mortem Examination

On occasions, a hospital doctor may ask you for permission to carry out a hospital post-mortem (PM) examination. This can help identify the nature and extent of the disease that your loved one died from and increase medical knowledge about it.

It is the next of kin's decision whether or not to give consent (permission) for this. If you wish to consider it, the doctor will explain what is involved and answer any questions you have. However, a hospital post-mortem is not compulsory and you can refuse.

Your Loved One's Belongings

When people die in a place other than their own home they will usually have personal items with them. Nursing staff can assist you to gather your loved one's belongings. If there are things which you do not wish to take home and keep, nursing staff can arrange for their disposal. Coming back to collect personal belongings can be a difficult experience therefore it is best to take them as you are leaving. Money sent to the cash office is returned as a cheque, usually through a solicitor. The return of valuables may be delayed because of legal requirements. The cash office staff can advise you.

The Funeral Director

Before your loved one died, they may have discussed with you the type of funeral they would like and their wishes for burial or cremation. If they didn't have this conversation, your family, friends, faith/belief representative or funeral director can help you plan how to say goodbye. Most people use the services of a funeral director when arranging a funeral. Funeral directors are available seven days a week and provide a 24-hour on-call service throughout the year. You or your loved one may have already chosen a funeral director. If not, you will find details at:

- National Association of Funeral Directors www.nafd.org.uk
- National Society of Allied and Independent Funeral Directors www.saif.org.uk
- www.naturaldeathsociety.org.uk

If your loved one died in hospital, the funeral director will contact the mortuary staff and will inform you when their body can be released.

The funeral director will help with many things that need to be done including:

- Arranging collection of your loved one from the hospital mortuary or place of death
- The preparation, care and dressing of your loved one
- Contacting your faith/belief representative, place of worship, cemetery or crematorium to arrange the funeral
- Arranging completion of the cremation form for the crematorium (if required)
- Assisting with the selection of a coffin
- Arranging the purchase and/or opening of a grave

- Inserting newspaper notices
- Ordering flowers
- Providing a hearse and additional cars for the funeral.

The funeral director will discuss all costs to help you decide what is right for you.

Spiritual Support

After the death of a loved one, many people get support and comfort from their faith/belief representative. If you would like a faith/belief representative to help you plan and prepare for the funeral service, contact them as soon as possible to discuss the arrangements. If you are unsure who to contact, your funeral director can advise.

Registering a Death

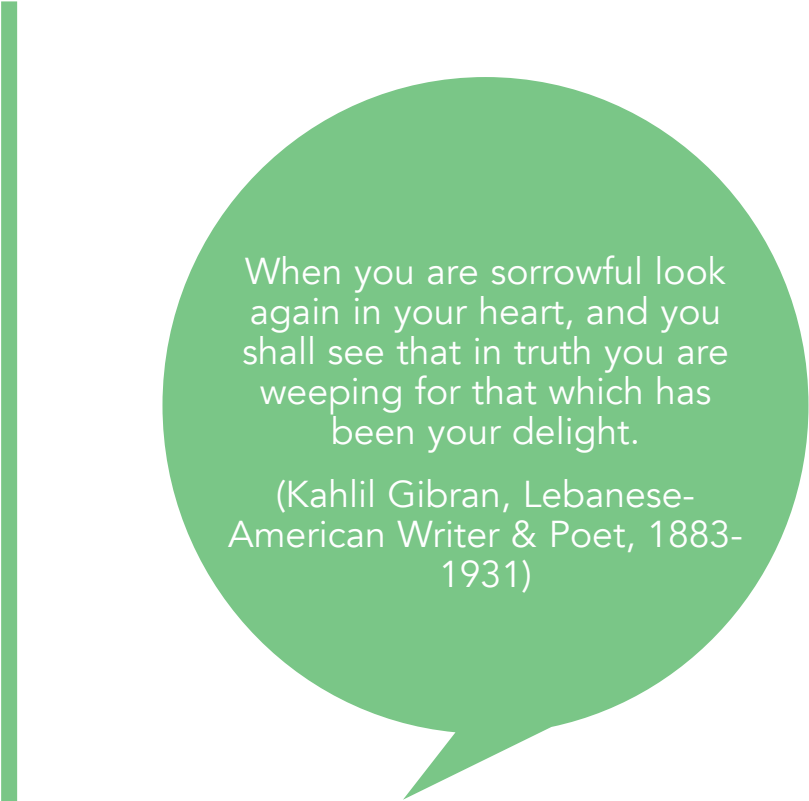

Normally, when someone dies, a Medical Certificate of Cause of Death (MCCD) is completed by the doctor treating them. This would have been given to the family to be taken to the local registrar's office to enable a death certificate to be issued. This process is required before a funeral can take place.

When someone dies during the COVID-19 pandemic a doctor completes a MCCD and emails it to the General Registrar's Office who forward it to your local registrar's office. The registrar's office then contacts a named person in your family to get information needed to complete the registration process. The funeral director may register the death on your behalf. Once the death has been registered, the registrar will issue a Certificate for Burial or Cremation to the funeral director so they can proceed with the burial or cremation. There is no cost for registering a death but it can be useful to buy a number of certified copies of the death certificate. This is because organisations that you need to contact often ask for a certified copy; photocopies are unacceptable. Copies can be ordered online at www.nidirect.gov.uk/services/order-death-certificate-online

Repatriation

Repatriation is the process of returning a deceased person to their home country. If you wish to have your loved one's body returned to another country the funeral director can assist with the administration and practicalities involved.

When you are sorrowful look again in your heart, and you shall see that in truth you are weeping for that which has been your delight.

(Kahlil Gibran, Lebanese-
American Writer & Poet, 1883-1931)

What Else Needs to be Done?

The Social Security Bereavement Service

You must call the Bereavement Service if your loved one was receiving a state pension or Social Security benefits. The Bereavement Service will record the date of their death and inform each office from which your loved one was receiving benefits. They will also offer you an eligibility check, as you may be entitled to claim benefits. If you are eligible to make a claim for 'Bereavement Support payment' and/or 'Funeral payment' they can also take the information for your application over the phone and forward it to the relevant department. You can contact the Bereavement Service on freephone number 0800 085 2463.

Return of Equipment

If your loved one was cared for at home, you may find it distressing to have equipment remain in the house or find it difficult to let the equipment go. To organise the collection of equipment, you can contact the district nurse, who will arrange for the removal of items such as electric beds and hoists. The nurse will also remove the patient records and advise you about the safe return of unused medicines to the local pharmacy.

You can arrange for removal of other equipment, such as wheelchairs, commodes and bathing or walking aids, by contacting your local occupational therapy (OT) department. The OT department will do their best to arrange timely removal; please be understanding as this may take several days.

Meeting Funeral Costs

Funerals can be expensive, and some people may have contributed to a payment plan to help cover the cost of their funeral. If you are receiving particular benefits, you may qualify for financial help such as a funeral payment. You can ask your funeral director for information on funeral payments. You can also find more details at www.nidirect.gov.uk/articles/funeral-expenses-payments

People and Organisations to Tell

You need to inform a number of people and organisations when someone dies. Early contact will help avoid the distress of letters, telephone calls and supplies/equipment continuing in the weeks and months ahead. This can be a difficult task to complete. Perhaps a friend or relative could help find the numbers for you and make some of the calls or send the letters. The list below and on pages 18 and 19 details professionals and organisations you may need to contact. You can find relevant contact details at www.nidirect.gov.uk You may find it useful to copy the sample letter on page 20 and complete a copy for each contact.

How you may be Feeling

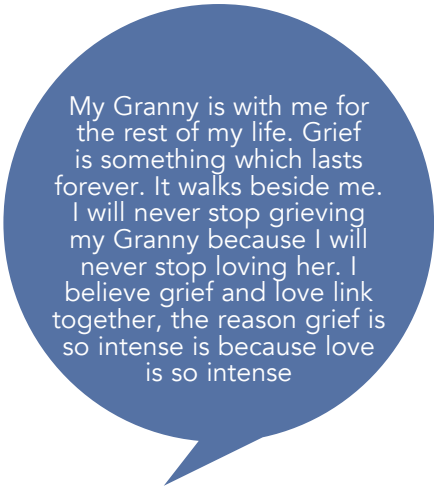

How you may be Feeling

Coping with Grief

Grief is a normal process that we all experience following a loss. People react to loss in different ways. Grief is very individual.

This section describes some of the feelings that might affect how you think and behave when you are grieving. You might be surprised by your thoughts, feelings and behaviours. Not everyone will experience all of these. You may feel some more strongly than others, and they may come in any order or be mixed up together.

There is no time limit for the feelings associated with grief - for some people it is a matter of months, for others, years. You need to give yourself time to adjust and re-engage in life in the absence of the person who died.

My Granny is with me for the rest of my life. Grief is something which lasts forever. It walks beside me. I will never stop grieving my Granny because I will never stop loving her. I believe grief and love link together, the reason grief is so intense is because love is so intense

Thoughts and Feelings Associated with Grief

You may feel numb at first. You may experience feelings of shock and disbelief, even if the death was expected. It may feel unreal - you may feel you cannot accept that your loved one has died. This is a normal reaction that protects you from the reality of your loss.

It is not uncommon to feel guilty. For example, you may feel guilty for things you think you should have or should not have said or done. You may experience a feeling of disloyalty when you find yourself pursuing new or old interests.

You may feel angry at the person who died. You may blame other family members or the professionals involved in the care of your loved one. Depending on your faith or beliefs, you may question 'why' this was allowed to happen.

Part of grieving is trying to make sense of something that seems senseless. You may find yourself thinking 'If only...'

If you have lost someone who has been a big part of your life, your home may seem very empty. The feeling of isolation can be painfully strong. You may feel sorry for yourself.

Longing can be a big part of grief. Some describe this feeling as similar to 'losing your mind'. For instance, you may look for your loved one in a crowd; you may think you have seen them or even heard their voice, even though you know that they are dead.

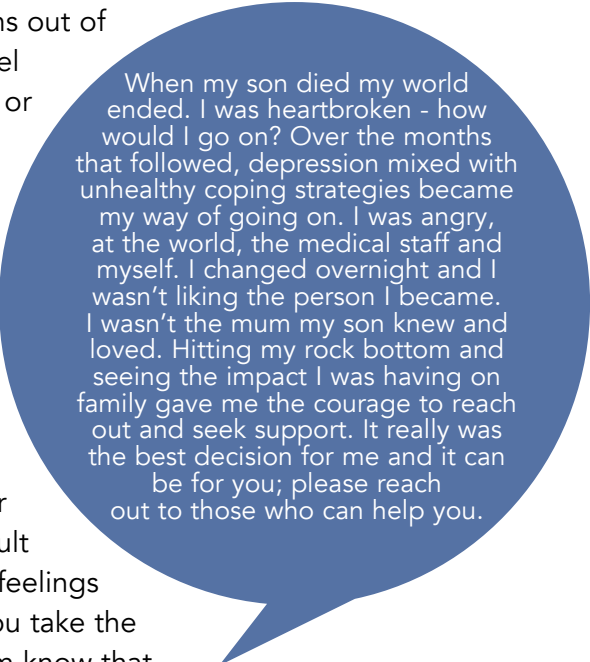

People respond differently to bereavement; even members from the same family respond in different ways. Everyone has their own way of grieving and how they show and cope with their feelings can be very different; this can be difficult for others to understand.

It is common to have feelings of sadness and depression. These should lessen with time. If however, the feelings get stronger and you are unable to carry out normal tasks or you experience suicidal thoughts, then it is important for you to seek specialist help. The usual way to access this is through your GP. You can also access help through Lifeline which provides 24-hour support for those in distress. Telephone Freephone 0808 808 8000 or access at www.lifelinehelpline.info

Physical and Behavioural Changes

You may feel tired but can't sleep. You may feel hungry but unable to eat. You may have difficulty concentrating and be easily distracted or forgetful. You may find yourself in a state of panic or viewing simple problems out of proportion. You may feel run down and lethargic or have aches and pains that you don't normally have. This can be a normal part of the grieving process. You may find that friends and neighbours sometimes avoid you. This is because they do not know what to say or they are finding it difficult to cope with their own feelings of loss. It may help if you take the first step by letting them know that you would appreciate their friendship and support.

When my son died my world ended. I was heartbroken - how would I go on? Over the months that followed, depression mixed with unhealthy coping strategies became my way of going on. I was angry, at the world, the medical staff and myself. I changed overnight and I wasn't liking the person I became. I wasn't the mum my son knew and loved. Hitting my rock bottom and seeing the impact I was having on family gave me the courage to reach out and seek support. It really was the best decision for me and it can be for you; please reach out to those who can help you.

Seek advice from your GP
if you are concerned

It might seem that life would be more bearable if you made drastic changes to avoid painful memories, such as moving house or disposing of your loved one's belongings. Try to avoid doing this at an early stage in your loss. There will come a time when it is right for you to make such important decisions.

Talking to Someone

It is important to take care of yourself. One of the most helpful things can be to talk about the person who has died. Only you can decide who would be most helpful to speak to. It could be:

- A family member
- A friend
- Your faith/belief representative
- Your GP
- Someone from a support organisation.

Further details of support organisations can be found on page 38.

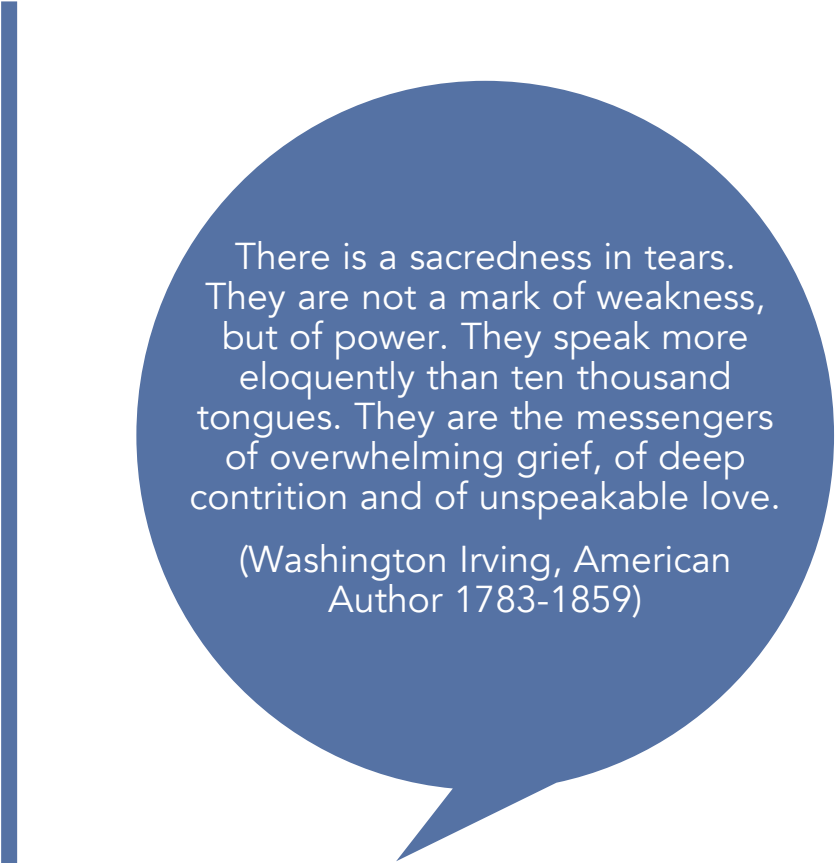

My husband died seven weeks after his cancer diagnosis. This was a terrible shock. I miss him terribly. If it wasn't for my faith I would never have got through this. He died two years ago. I am feeling a bit better now and knowing he is at peace gives me great comfort. I have made new friends and my church has been good to me. My husband told me before he died to look after myself, to make a new life and move on so that's what I'm trying to do.

Try to:

- Talk about the person who has died
- Look after yourself. Eat properly and try to rest even if you can't sleep
- Give yourself time and permission to grieve
- Seek help and support if you feel you need it
- Tell people what you need

Try not to:

- Isolate yourself or keep emotions bottled up
- Think you are weak for needing help
- Feel guilty if you are struggling to cope
- Turn to drugs or alcohol as the relief will only be temporary

There is a sacredness in tears.
They are not a mark of weakness,
but of power. They speak more eloquently than ten thousand tongues. They are the messengers of overwhelming grief, of deep contrition and of unspeakable love.

(Washington Irving, American Author 1783-1859)

Caring for Children

Caring for Children

Adults often feel the need to protect children from death and their own grief, as they think the children will find it too upsetting. However, children are often more frightened when they are not sure what is going on around them than when they are allowed to be a part of it. When you tell children that a loved one has died, use simple language and answer any questions as honestly as you can. Use words such as 'dead' and 'death' rather than 'lost' or 'sleeping' which can be confusing for them. Pre-school children generally don't understand that death is permanent and may repeatedly ask questions such as 'When is granny coming back?' Children of primary school age usually have an understanding of the finality of death and often ask direct questions about it.

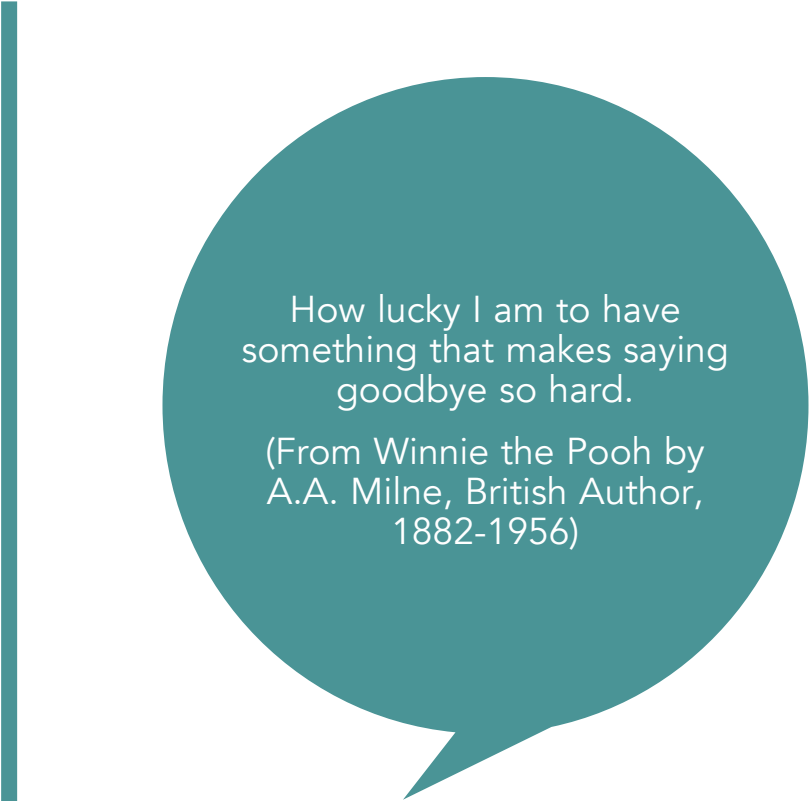

Signs of Grief

Children may display symptoms such as becoming quiet and withdrawn, clingy towards a parent, bed-wetting, fearing the dark, or displaying sleep or behavioural problems at home or school. These are all normal reactions for young children, and for most they will pass in time. Teenagers are already going through physical and emotional changes, and communication can often be difficult for this age group. They often feel a sense of injustice and question why their relative or friend had to die. They may 'test the boundaries' by, for example, staying out late or losing interest in school. It can be helpful for them to talk about their feelings. It is important that they feel someone is listening to them and acknowledging how they feel.

Helping Children Cope

Sometimes it helps to allow children to decide for themselves whether or not they wish to see the person after death. However, to enable them to make their decision, you will need to prepare them by explaining what they will see. For young children you may need to explain that the body no longer eats, talks, walks or sleeps and that it may feel cold to touch.

Children and young people who were close to the person who died may like to be involved in planning and taking part in the funeral. It may be helpful to encourage the child to write a letter, draw a picture or put a small gift or toy in the coffin (take care that this does not include batteries or electrical items if your loved one is going to be cremated). This can be a positive way for the child to say goodbye. You can also encourage children to remember the person who died by sharing stories, looking at photographs or keeping mementos. They may wish to keep a memory box or book containing special things or thoughts of their loved one. As with adults, sometimes individual children will benefit from specialist bereavement support. If you think this is the case for a child in your care, contact your GP or one of the organisations listed in the Support Organisations section of this booklet.

How lucky I am to have something that makes saying goodbye so hard.

(From Winnie the Pooh by
A.A. Milne, British Author,
1882-1956)

Getting Through and Facing the Future

Getting Through and Facing the Future

After someone dies it may be that you look after everyone except yourself. It can sometimes be tempting to become very busy and to exhaust yourself with tasks so that the tiredness blots out some of the pain, even for a moment or two. Trying to put on a brave face and ignore your feelings may only prolong the pain and hurt. Taking care of yourself may mean spending time in the company of friends with whom you can be honest, or it may mean choosing to be alone. You may want different things on different days. It's important to recognise your needs and to make sure you care for them.

Taking Care of Yourself

- Try to eat well even if you don't feel like it
- Get some rest, even if you can't sleep
- Take some gentle exercise
- Accept help with chores if offered
- Try to find some routine to your day
- Try not to turn to 'quick fixes' that may cause additional distress.

Be kind to yourself

Suggestions that may Help

Allow yourself time to grieve. Accept that crying is a normal way to release your feelings and that you may need to allow yourself to cry sometimes. Try to accept help from others, and do not allow yourself to become isolated. Remember that anniversaries, birthdays and Christmas can intensify feelings of grief, so you may benefit from extra support at these times. Try to keep to routines - perhaps re-establish old routines or set new ones.

Check with your GP if you have any health worries

If you find yourself isolated or alone try to be open to new things, for example, exploring new hobbies or maybe joining local community groups or clubs. Sharing your feelings can be helpful. It is not always easy to do this with family and friends, and you may prefer to speak with someone else you can trust. You might also consider contacting a local organisation that offers bereavement support. (See the 'Support Organisations' section towards the back of this booklet) Remember, you will have good days and bad days. Allow yourself to laugh, cry and be angry - you have lost someone you love and it hurts. As time passes you will find that memories are perhaps less painful. You will be able to remember without becoming so distressed. You may find yourself pursuing new or old interests. Keep in mind that specific things which may be too painful for you to do at the beginning may provide comfort later on, for example, visiting the grave, listening to a special piece of music or looking at photographs. Starting a box for mementos such as letters, pictures and items that had special significance for your loved one can also be a helpful focus for your grief. Keeping a journal can help you to process painful feelings that you may find hard to share. Try to avoid becoming dependent on substances such as alcohol, non-prescribed medications or drugs.

"My Dad died five years ago today. After visiting his grave, I went for a walk around the lake where we had walked together after his surgery for cancer. Physically, that was a real challenge for Dad but his mental stamina was amazing. Following the same path we had taken that day and remembering Dad's determination, gave me the strength I needed to cope with this anniversary."

Facing Difficult Occasions

You may be particularly affected on and near significant anniversaries for many years after a death. Some people find it helpful to plan in advance what they are going to do on those days, to avoid feeling left alone with their emotions. Some people create a tradition of visiting special places that remind them of the person who has died. Others find this too painful. There is no right or wrong way to mark anniversaries; you need to find the right way for you.

Your notes

What we have enjoyed, we can never lose... all that we love deeply becomes a part of us.

(Helen Keller, American deaf-blind author, lecturer and activist, 1880-1968)

A dark blue speech bubble with a white outline, containing text about grief. The bubble has a tail pointing downwards and to the left.

Grief never ends but it changes. It's a passage not a place to stay. Grief is not a sign of weakness nor a lack of faith. Grief is the price of love.
